ABOUT

I'm no stranger to playing many roles, both onstage and off. I grew up in Ohio then set off for Chicago to pursue my acting dream. During my time there, I performed, directed, and was artistic director of a 20 year old storefront theatre company. My work experience consists of administrative roles that have blended my project management skills, customer service acumen and tech skills. After turning 30, I found myself wanting a more fulfilling day job and, after some introspection, turned to my lifelong love of video games and technology. The creative problem solving and storytelling behind programming appealed to me as an artist while also offering exciting career opportunities.

I enjoy building software that improves the quality of life for a diverse range of users and am especially interested in VR development, both practical and game related. With my background as a storyteller and casual graphic designer, I believe that UX and UI can make or break a good application. As a developer, my focus is solely on the user and how to increase accessibility.
